Andrew Mangan
Executive Director, United States Business Council for Sustainable Development

Andrew Mangan is co-founder and executive director of the United States Business Council for Sustainable Development, the leading national business organization in creating cross-industry and public-private relationships to solve environmental and social challenges while improving its members’ bottom line.

The Business Council provides the opportunity to participate in authentic sustainability projects with industry, government and other key stakeholders that might not otherwise have the chance to collaborate and network. The projects generate economic returns while improving the environment and society — the triple bottom line.

The US Business Council is a partner of the World Business Council for Sustainable Development (WBCSD), a global network of 200 international companies with members drawn from 30 countries and 20 major industrial sectors.

Mr. Mangan received a master’s degree from the Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism, where he also attended the School of International Affairs as an International Fellow. Prior to organizing the Business Council, he was president of Applied Sustainability, LLC; served as deputy commissioner for natural resources with the Texas General Land Office; worked as a congressional correspondent for the Associated Press; and commercially fished in Southeast Alaska.
